The Olmechi Ancient Olmechi were one of the first advanced civilizations in Mesoamerica and, as such, subsequently influenced the most known civilizations in that area. Historians estimate that Olmec civilization arose somewhere between 1400 and 1200 A.C. (Although some estimates push this back to 1600 A.C.). People have found the land and waters of the coatzacoalcos river basin very useful, with the Gulf of Mexico to the north. As the civilization has grown, it widened, to what is now Southern and Western Mexico and Guatemala. Prime between the remains of the Olmec civilization are the colossal stone heads, some of which are still adorning the wings of modern museums. The heads weigh several tons and are, in some cases, more than 10 feet in height. Furthermore, archaeologists found that the stone heads rested, in some cases, dozens of miles from where the stone was invaded. The ancient Maya from humble beginning in Yucatan, Maya has grown to the domain about what is now central America and South Mexico, spreading their knowledge of science, architecture and distant and wide survival. Maya are famous for things, including advanced farming techniques, writing in hieroglyphics, superior knowledge of astronomy and the passing of time, creators of rugged art, and a war-based ball game that echoes through the centuries. Mayan settlements began around 1800 BC in what is now El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras e Messico.
