The song was published for the first time as a single CD promotional per month before the album exit, then in February 1992 it was republished as a double single A-side with the IF My Homie Calls song. The song, which presents the singler R & B Dave Hollister singing vocal background with Roniecce Levias, is a 12-year-old girl named Brenda who lives in a ghetto and has a child who she can't sustain. The song explores the problem of teenage pregnancy and its effect on young mothers and their families. Like many of Shakur's songs, "Brenda's Got to Baby" draw from the impoverished drama. Using Brenda to represent young mothers in general, Shakur criticizes the low level of support for the child's father, government and society in general. Shakur wrote the song while turning the feature film Juice, after reading a newspaper article on a 12-year-old girl who was pregnant with her cousin and threw the child in a garbage compactor. [1] The opening consists of a duet that sings the title of the song twice. Much of the rest of the song is a long verse performed by Tupac. The verse begins with Tupac telling a group that he heard about Brenda's pregnancy. He also notes that she had practically no education, and calls this a "wisdom bad" because she has little hope of a future. The family of her is very poor and father of her is addict. Brenda is impregnated by her boyfriend not called her, who is also her cousin her cousin, but she managed to hide her pregnancy. Tupac explains that the family of her would not force her if she gave birth to her, as long as she got the cutting of government assistance. Although he believes that her cousin (her father of her) will remain with her and will help her grow their child, he's just a molester, and abandon him before he goes on the bathroom floor. He throws the child into a "waste soap", but then he recovers him when she feels crying. She mother shrouds severely, and Brenda is ashamed so much of herself that she runs away from home. Brenda is now forced to live alone and without success looking for work. His attempt to sell Crack Cocaine translates into robbery, and you in the end she sees prostitution like her unique way to you to earn money and survive. This way of life leads you to be killed. The destinies of his parents, cousin and the child of her are left unexplained. The last minute of the song consists of a choir singing "Don't you know that she has a child?" repeatedly. The beginning of the song can be heard in the song is black and white. It was done to display what Shakur narrates. The first part shows Shakur and "Brenda" and then begins the real story. Ethel "Edy" Proctor playsThe video begins with "Based on a True Story", although the characters themselves are fictitious, Shakur wrote the song after reading a story in the newspaper about a 12-year-old girl getting pregnant by her cousin and trying to dispose of the baby in a trash can. Parts of the video were included in Tupac: Resurrection, a 2003 documentary about the life of 2pac, in a TV show later in the music video of the "Gospel Ghetto", in the music video of the "Gospel Ghetto", in the music video of the "Gospel Ghetto", in the music video of the "Changes" and appears as a bonus in its entirety the DVD of the movie. Part of the video and song was played in 2pac's biopic movie, All Eyez About Me, released on June 16, 2017. The video was directed by the Hughes brothers.
