This article was originally appeared on Housebeautiful.com. The iTunes App Store has an important problem of discovery: with nearly 100,000 apps that exude from its ranks, it is difficult to sift the rabbassa to find good things. A new App called Chorus, which affects the App Store this week, is intended to make app-to search for a more intelligent, more social way. Several websites such as AppStoreHQ, appshopper and appspots have already been sprouted to face the same requirement, but none of these sites live on the iPhone itself. (For their credit, they offer some chero services that do not notify different when the apps are on sale, while others have detailed blogs that help drive users.) Chorus pulls Facebook contacts and address books and asks for their app recommendations. That is a good way to get suggestions from your friends. But it also allows you to see other Chorus users' recommendations, and allows you to restrict people near you who might want to show you their app collection. If you don't trust your peers, there are always $\hat{A} \in \hat{\mathcal{A}}$ - \hat{A} "appmavens, $\hat{A} \in \hat{\mathcal{A}}$ - or users who got a follow-up on Chorus as a quality app-binders. The choir seems to be targeted mainly to people who have no time or inclination to Troll the App Store and want to use their friends as shortcuts. If you are on the other end of this report $\hat{A} \in \hat{\mathcal{A}}$ - \hat{A} "ie, if \hat{a} " ϵ is the expert of the App Store that people consult for suggestions - you may be more interested in appsniper, which monitors the price on the apps And it warns you when prices go down. Chorus, which is made by Send developer, is available for free and can be downloaded from the iTunes store here. Whether you have moved to a new city or you're ready to get more social in your place Current, there is no reason to sit at home alone and hope that something comes.
